3. It Sets a Bad Example. In an article on the Union Pacific blog, Community Ties, one photography studio was criticized for simply using an artificial backdrop that depicted railroad tracks because it communicated to children and teens that it's ok to walk and play near tracks. As photographers, we might justify the fact that photographing on tracks that are no longer be in use is safe, but ...

"Did they build it with a crane? Did they build it with a plane?" There's a reason such a question would be asked about a private home located between Talkeetna and Willow (as it has been in this Reddit thread): it looks like something straight out of Dr. Seuss. After all, it's a house with a 185-foot-tall skinny tower that looks like layers of a wedding cake.
